Once, a greatest philosopher said: "A bird may be known by it's song". In my opinion, that proverb can be understood as an individualism, that each person in the world have got. All of us are different, all of us have their own understanding of the world. It shows our personal features.

For example, to illustrate my opinion, let's take an usual school class. All children in that class are different ^{only} because they have different appearance or age. Their individualism shows their character and views for the world. So, this proverb is not about birds, it's about ourselves.

In conclusion, our world is big, there are a lot of races, professions and opinions. We are different, all of us are interesting and amazing. People make our world bigger, than it may seems. Individualism is more, just a word, it a huge strength, that lives in people, makes them better. All of us a huge strength, and it's very important to be different. Only differences makes us special. I agree, that "a bird may be known by it's song".
